Course Description: This course will examine a range of approaches used in the study of intergroup relations, with special emphasis on struggles over influence and power. Students will acquire a deeper understanding of the complex intersection, as well as the overlap among forms of identity and group mobilization based on ethnic, linguistic, regional, class, gender, racial and other forms of social division. The course will also cover Indigenous issues and policies related to multiculturalism, equity and local or regional autonomy.

Format: Seminar: Students will be expected to come to class having done the readings and prepared to engage in meaningful discussion. Short presentations and class discussion will form part of the evaluation. Students will work on individual research projects and engage with one another through shared readings.
