Brief Course Synopsis:

Course Description: Students will examine how nineteenth-century American literary culture articulated a vision of national consolidation and a standard of justice in their narratives about difference. Nineteenth-century American writers covered in this course re-drew or blurred the boundaries between the individual and the collective, the private and the public, the home and the market, and the citizen and the non-citizen. As students progress through the nineteenth century, they will be asked to pay particular attention to the ethical and political implications of such literary interventions into the political and social spheres.
